“Do you guys know who she is? She used to hold the highest power in all of Bangladesh! She used to lead more than 140 million people and a country. Now, she’s facing the death penalty.”

Today, I’m going to talk about an article from BBC News titled “Ex-leader Hasina gambles on return to Bangladesh despite death penalty” published on Thursday, 6th August 2026 about former Bangladesh Prime Minister, Sheikh Hasina, and the accusations against her regarding the crackdown on a student-led demonstration.

According to the UN, up to 1,400 people were killed by the crackdown. The BBC also reported an audio recording of a phone call verified by BBC Eye; Hasina was heard authorising the deadly crackdown on demonstrators to an unidentified senior government official. Even with all of this evidence Hasina still denies being guilty for this crime against humanity and fled to India while a trial was being held without her. She was sentenced to death. Not only that, her absence in India also strained the relationships between the two powers.

I believe that this article is slightly biased when viewed from the people who are interviewed and the language the news company uses.

First, I think there is some bias in the perspective of the article. Even though the news mostly focuses on people who are against Hasina, such as the UN who provided evidence, it does not give much attention to the perspective of the special forces who carried the crackdown under the command of Hasina.

Second, I think there is also some bias in the language used. The article begins by mentioning Hasina denial of the accusations then explaining why she was given the death sentence. This structure acts like a hook making the reader more interested to learn about what happened and why it happened.

In the end, this story reminds us how one action from a leader can affect millions of people and leave huge consequences.
